

I strongly urge you to maintain Wisconsin's current no-call list regulations. Since, being on the list, my family is actually able to have dinner together and conversations throughout the evening! This was not possible before with the constant phone calls. Also, our answering machine is no longer monopolized with meaningless electronic dial up calls. I realize that there is technology available to screen numbers calling in, but I don't think that people should have to pay extra money and put extra energy into preventing people from disrupting them at home. There are other, much less offensive, ways of advertising services, such as direct mail. If marketers begin to call me at home again, I will gladly boycott whatever brand or service that they are hawking.

Sally Severson